Hi-Fi

A flood of stereo records has hit the market this fall and the most obvious thing about them is the improvement in quality.

The record manufacturers, like the hi-fi fan, are comparable in quality to monophonic records, which had already reached a high standard when stereo was first developed.

Dealers report a steady decline in the sale of the big speaker systems that used to be the pride of the hi-fi fan. As one dealer puts it, "They're almost like the dinosaur."

The Institute of High Fidelity Manufacturers have recognized obvious and issued a formal pronouncement that "stereophonic" and "high fidelity" don't mean the same thing.

Abraham Schwartzman, executive secretary of the institute, points out that "stereophonic" simply means that there are two channels of sound on a record.

"High fidelity" refers to the degree of faithfulness with which the record is made and reproduced," he says. "Today, nearly all recordings, stereophonic and monophonic, are high fidelity. However, whether or not you get high fidelity music depends upon your home play-back system."

"Stereo is more critical than monophonic. For pleasing, undistorted sound it is vital that the home reproduction equipment be of true high fidelity quality."

Harmon-Kardon, Inc., one of the veteran manufacturers of high fidelity components, has entered the booming component kit field.

"The company has formed a new division, the Harmon-Kardon Division," says the first two products of the new line are being made.
