THE SCOPE OF THE FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL IN POLAND

The knowledge of the pertinent provisions of the exchange restrictions in Poland effective as of April 27 is essential not only to the business community but to the public at large. In absence of any authoritative translation of the provisions already issued, the following might be of interest.

iation of the provisions already issued, the following might be of interest.

The foreign exchange control is broadly regulated by the Presidential Decree of April 26 published in the Official Gazette (Dziennik Ustaw No. 32). It would be misleading, however, to read the above decree literally. This is to say, its provisions are in many instances subject to the subsequent regulations of the Treasury and the Bank of Poland. Such regulations as thus far have been issued, namely the regulations of the Treasury dated April 26 (Dziennik Ustaw No. 32) and instructions of the Bank of Poland to the exchange banks, have by no means exhausted the possibilities still left in the Presidential Decree. This is to say that the exchange control in Poland is still much more liberal than the Decree would indicate. This liberal feature is further emphasized by the regulations which are presently being issued allowing a number of exceptions from the restrictions generally invoked. invoked.

Assets Abroad

Invoked.

Assets Abroad

The most glaring example of the above may be found in Paragraph No. 10 of the Presidential Decree, instructing all the residents of Poland to offer to the Bank of Poland all their claims against foreigners in any form. The subsequent subparagraph, however, mentions, that the above obligation is subject to subsequent regulations. Such regulations issued by the Treasury provide only for compulsory offering of the proceeds from merchandise sold abroad by Pollish exporters. This is to say that all other assets abroad like bank accounts, securities etc, do not need to be offered by the public to the Bank of Poland, although the Treasury is empowered at any time to change this situation should the present measures turnout to be inadequate. Generally speaking, it is the objective of the Exchange Commission that all legitimate trade and financial requirements be satisfied with a minimum of inconvenience. To this end all individuals and firms wishing to effect any transaction in foreign exchange should apply to any of the so called exchange banks where they should file an application on a special form for which a fee of 50 grossy is charged. There should be attached to the application the pertinent documents evidencing the necessity of buying the exchange or making a payment to the local account of a foreigner residing abroad etc. as the case might be. Such documents may be represented by commercial invoices and shipping documents, bills. etc. Whereupon, depending on the nature of the transaction, on the nature of the transaction, the client may be given immediate permission by the exchange bank of putting through the ideal, otherwise the application must be referred to the Exchange Commission by the bank in question where it will be acted upon within two to three days.

Privileges

In this connection it is of importance to know just what sort of business may be put through immediately without the necessity of obtaining the permission of the Commission. In the first place the sale of foreign exchange or gold in any form to the exchange banks does not require any permission. Secondly, Polish residents going abroad may buy foreign exchanges up to an equivalent of Zi. 500 per month on one passport, those going to Danzig up to Zi, 500 per month on the passport, those going to Danzig up to Zi, 500 per month, but no more than 100 zl. at one time, and those crossing the frontier on a frontier pass, no more than 50 zl. per month, but no more than 50 zl. at a time. Furthermore, the remittance of funds abroad to cover tuilion, cost of living of persons abroad, costs of treatment etc. may be arranged at once up to an equivalent of Zi. 250- in any one month for each such person, provided that the respective documents evidencing the eligibility of the transaction are presented to the exchange bank, to wit: consular certificate, bills etc.

LONDON LETTER THE VOYAGE OF THE "GRAF HINDENBURG" ACROSS THE NORTH-ATLANTIC

By Gregory MacDonald

Like so many recent sensations, the Emperor of Abyssinia's flight from Addis Ababa became news on a Saturday morning, leaving a wsek-end of confusion before any prediction could be made as to the next turn of events. But the week-end concided also with the French elections. Now that the composition of the French Chamber is known, and negotiations having been started to explore the German and the French proposals, the British Government must crystallize new lines of policy within the next few days. It would be difficult to say what are the popular reactions to the latest events. The official, or journalistically official, attitude is one of intense sympathy for the latest events. The official, or journalistically official, attitude is one of intense sympathy for Abyssinia and for the Negus, with a disposition to discount Italian successes obtained by the use of poison gas, and even (in the Left Wing papers) to demand a more vigorous League policy to the point of military sanctions. Among more sceptical newspaper readers there are varying degrees of sympathy for the Negus, and a division of opinion for or against Italy, but the use of gas is widely held to have sullied the Italian victory, and from the standpoint of "imponderables" its employment was a great mistake. Yet what has to be faced now is political reality. That the Geneva policy has failed is evident to everybody. That the failure of Geneva means a race in armaments and a general war is an opinion encouraged by marny wrifers.

There is, however, another side to the question, less frequently put forward. The assumption in recent months has been that the League Powers were all peace-loving nations and that the countries outside the League or Lady Drummond-Hay, the well-known English writer and traveller, will fly the North Atlantic on board the "Graf Hindenburg." During the voyage she will send delight despatches exclusively to the Warsaw Weekly and the North American Newspaper Alliance. A preliminary despatch from Lady Drummond Hay is given below.

By Lady Drummond Hay

The Zeppelin "Graf Hindenburg," with motors overhauled, tested and reinstalled, is ready for her first North Transatlantic flight, and prepared to depart on schedule. Passengers, thrilled with anticipation, are beginning to arrive; provisioning of the giant airship proceeds apace.

Altogether there will be 104 souls aboard, 54 crew including ten learners, three cooks and seven stewards and the 50 passengers.

A Special Plane

A Special Plane

A special plane with passengers and final mails will leave Berlin on Tuesday night or Wednesday morning. Dr. Eckener who is again persona grata with the Nazi Government, will be incharge, with Captain Ernst Lehmann in command under him. There will be no attempt to establish a record, for both Dr. Eckener and Captain Lehmann are prepared to delay the actual arrival, if that should be necessary, for a daytime flight over Washington and Philadelphia and arrival in New York.

When the "Graf Hindenburg" lifts her 220 tons from the Loewenthal aerodrome here, it will not be "just another Zeppelin," but the Phoenix rising from the ashes of the ill-fated R 101, the Akron and the "Macon" to confront a sceptical world fifty passengers in luxury, will be the arbitrator of the fate of lighter-than-air craft for a long time to come. In making her own way through the sky, the Hindenburg will trail from her tail the shades of unborn Zeppelins for future Transatlantic, Transpacific and Far Eastern service. In its way, the Hindenburg is just as great an experiment as the Graf Zeppelin, because there is concrete commercial competition at stake. The Graf Zeppelin has remained unique and unchallenged. As far as the Europe to New York service is concerned, the Hindenburg and its successors challenge and will be challenged. Colossal liners of fantastic luxury like the "Queen Mary", the "Normandie", even the "Bremen" and "Erropa", emburk passengers at convensiently accessible ports, permit almost utilmited baggage, speed to New York during four or five days of incessant entertainment and epicurean hospitality. So long as the Zeppelins demand trained and numerous landing-crews on the ground, departure and arrival must be limited. There is still a certain amount of risk attached to, and prejudice against air-travel; air-transport of baggage in excess of the minimum is costly and there can be no doubt that airship schedules are more dependant upon the weather than steamers. A Zeppelin service has to compete against facts which still appeal to the majority as definite davantages. The sporting Graf Zeppelin is hardly a criterion, so the whole interest is centred on how will the Hindedburg do it? Aboard we are going to have a sufficiently varied passenger-list. Explorers, aviation experts, seasoned travellers, the luxny-conscious, and most valuable of all, the bona fide "commuter" between the Old World and the New, The result should be highly illuminating.

A MESSAGE TO READERS

With its next issue The Warsaw Weekly will enter into a new phase of its existence under the editorship of Mr.-Egerton Sykes, Polish Correspondent for The Morning Post.

Among the changes which will be introduced will be a series of articles reflecting on the political, economic and cultural existence of Poland and her neighbors, an increased amount of space to be devoted to those ameni'es of daily life affecting the American and English colonies in Poland, a special section for children, and, finally, numerous leaders on American and European reactions to current political events.

It will only be possible to introduce these changes gradually over a period of several weeks, during which it is hoped that old readers will continue their support not only by buying The Warsaw Weekly and recommending it to their friends, but also by advising the editor of any suggestions regarding the policy of the paper which they think might assist in its developement.

this moment in Great Britain. But it takes two to make a quarrel. If in fact the Powers outside the Geneva policy-the United States, Japan, Germany and Italy-have no intention at all of allowing a universal cataclysm, then the Geneva policy will prove to have been the provocative one because it all but tranformed an have been the provocative one because it all but tranformed an isolated conflict into a general war; and the only cause likely to benefit by that was the cause of World Revolution. Because the British people are as anxious for peace[as the French people, the Germans and the Poles, and because there are realistic groups in Eagland demanding an imaginative reconstruction of foreign policy, it may be after all that the failure of the attempt to implement the Covenant will prove a blessing in disguise, if only it strengthens open national rule at the expense of secret international rule. Certainly the period of Geneva was an inexticable tangle of national and international policies, with no indication that the statesmen of any country knew where one any country knew where one element began or where the other element ended. The confuother element ended. The confu-sion is associated with the break-down of international trade: peace will be in sight when an econo-mic and financial settlement is

Attitude of the House.

Some of these questions are likely to be ventilated in the House of Commons, where already a tense atmosphere has been created by the allegations that secrets of the Budget were used for speculation in the City. The debates on foreign and home affairs promise to be stormy, but there can be no great victory for the official Opposition because all along it has urged an aggressive Geneva policy and no one can claim that the Government, expecially during M Efer's net. tense atmosphere has been one can claim that the Government, especially during Mr. Eden's period of office, was second to another nation in the defense of the Covenant. The real danger for the Government now lies in the criticisms of its own supporters. The very size of its majority implies a possibility of rebellious groups and a weakness of control over individual members Again, more and more of of control over individual members. Again, more and more of the Government's supporters, especially among the traditional conservatives, are auxious to see more attention paid to affairs at home, and less attention paid to affairs abroad. Professor A. E. Housman may not have been so famous abroad as Bernard Shaw and Rudyard Kipling, At home he was best known among lovers of literature, for a lyric poet who lived quietly at Cambridge as a professor and editor of the classics had no desire to see himself a public figure. Housman published in his long life only two slim volumes of lyrics (apart from his lectures and editorial labours) but what he published was memorable and perfect. "A Shropshire-Lad" and "last Poems" invited parody (one sign of good work) because of their apparent simplicity and because of their gloomy insistence upon death. But the simplicity belied a mastery of metre and sound which few English lyricists have equalled. The use of Shropshire scenes put Housman in the first rank of writers who immortalize English counties. And the apparent pessimism of his insistence upon counties. And the apparent pes-simism of his insistence upon death was turned against his critics when he wrote on the army of the Great War as "An army of the Great war as "An Army of Mercenaries", with his magnificent challenge that "They saved the sum of things for pay." Housman will be numbered among the immortals of English litera-

Kurjer Polski discusses the question of the effect on the community of the new exchange regulations, which above were all regulations, which above were all evoked by comments of a political nature. This, it finds, is not strange as financal policy is in large measure dependent on the moods of society. Political events act on finances, which again re-act upon society. This was the fact last week in Poland.

We may, however, affirm with satisfaction that the high tide of unrest has already fallen. The proof of this is, that most sensitive of barometers, the money exchange.

Further, the Kurjer notes

a desire for cooperation among the masses of the community, and, on the other hand, a demand for a distinct attitude and policy from the Government in its struggles with e-onomic difficulties. So, exchange restrictions have been introduced that are to constitute a certain transitory immobilization of one of the sectors of the battle fromt.

Nasz Przegląd also foresees changes in the cabinet, but with the resignation on the part of the Premier. It sees in the May 1 manifestations, a spirit of con-ciliation towards the Government.

The authorities were sure that the leaders would be loyal, that they would do all they could and use the old devices of the social democrats, not to reply to provocation.

Referring to the question of the exchange regulations, Kurjer Poranny enumerates the advan-

IN MEMORY OF HENRYK SIENKIEWICZ

By Jerzy Macierakowski

On May 5 we passed the 90-th anniversary of the birth of Henryk Sienkiewicz, one of the titans of Polish literature, a prophet and teacher of the Polish nation a name forever bound with patriotism, love of Poland's glorious past, and faith in her future. Sienkiewicz was born in Wola Okrzejska in 1846. After finishing his higher studies in the University of Warsaw, then called The Main School, he began his literary career in 1872 with the novel In Vain (Na Marne), a work betraying strong influence of the Positivism then developing fast in Poland.

in Poland.
This first book and those immediately following it focused attention on him as an interesting narrator with a flair for spinning a agration with attain for spinning agood yarn while remaining extremely sensitive to natural beauty. His great work for the Polish nation, however, his reanimation of the Polish spirit and re-kindling of patriotic enthusiasm re-kindling of patriotic enthusiasm among his countrymen, came later in his stirring historical novels: With Fire and Sword (Ogniem i Mieczem — 1844) The Deluge (Potop — 1886), Pan Mi-chael (Pan Wolodyjwoski-1888), and The Knights of the Cross «Krzużacu-1900).

(Arzyzacy-1900).
To appreciate the real historical mission of these books one must first understand the attitude toward life which had at that time gained a strong foothold in the Polish mentality.

The Tragedy of 1863

It was just after the year 1863 and the tragic failure of the January insurrection, that heroic but frailless effort to win back the lost freedom of Poland. This was such a bitter experience that the Polish people almost began to recoil from the thought of trying armed resistance and had practically abandoned the hope of ever delivering the country from the yoke of the partitioning powers. Posilitvism dominated their outlook, a complete divorce ever delivering the country from the yoke of the partitioning powers. Positivism dominated their outlook, a complete divorce from all feeling and sentiment, a conviction of the futility of all searline, and a faith only in pure materialistic well-being and resignation to fate. Such an attitude was fast leading Poland to the lloss of her noble ideals and sinto the rut of satisfaction with the existing state of things. It would have spread wider and wider, atrophying the national spirit, and condemning it to eventual death had it not been for the sudden appearance on the literary horizon of him who all his life was directed by the dove of his country and the desire to serve it — Henryk Sienkiewicz. Recognizing the danger of this growing lethergy, Sienkiewicz. Recognizing the danger of this growing lethergy, Sienkiewicz took upon himself the task of awaking his countrymen out of it with the power of his pen and his ardentlove; by calling up the great deeds of the old and glorious Poland. He wanted to unite the hearts of all Poles in the great deeds of the old and glo-rious Poland. He wanted to unite the hearts of all Poles in the in the unwavering faith that the day would come when Poland would be free; she had been rocked to the foundations by cataclysms in the foundations by cataclysms in the past and had come out of them triumphant; she would still raise her head high again if her sons would only not lose faith.

It may easily be imagined what a literary event, what a sensation the appearance in quick succession of With Fire and Sword, The Deluge, Pan Michael and The Knights of the Cross must have made. They penetrated into every house, were as well known in the cottages as in the palaces, and roused the national spirit to such a pitch that it could not again die out. People spoke of nothing else but these could not again use our response of nothing else but these novels; they became the property of the whole Polish nation, and to this day they have not grown stale, nor have they lost any of their popularity or beauty.

Novelist Of Rare Genius

They must indeed have been They must indeed have been the works of a novelist of rare genius. It would be idle to deny this quality to Sienkiewiez. To be sure he did not create a new style, for he had fore-runners abroad like Sir Watter Scottt and Dumas, and Kraszewski and Rzewuski at home in Poland, but he woused new matter into these Rzewiski at home in Poland, but he poured new matter into these rendy forms with such tremen-dous talent that he swept the whole country like a forest fire. Sientiewicz, besides his splendid painter imagination in nature sketching, his impressive sweep in buttlescenes, and his incompar-sible, still in maintaining interest in battlescenes, and his incomparable skill in maintaining interest in his story is above all a character painter of infinite variety. All this in truly Polish form, in language simple and sincere, and is presented with dynamic force and clarity.

He never loses that balance, so difficult to strike, between the world of reality and ideals, and so without detracting the elements of the highest beauty from his novels he makes them inexpressibly real. He is a perfect realist, yet never degenerates to mere naturalism for he never lacks the many coloured splendour of yet never aggenerates to mere naturalism for he never lacks the many coloured splendour of literary imagination so essential to a novelist of the first water. Such masterpieces of creation as the death of Podbipięta in With Fire and Sword, or Nero's banquet in Quo Vadis, are things that one reads and never forgets. All these qualities are quite sufficient to make of Sienkiewicz one of the titans of European novel writing; but for Poland his pages emanate something far more significant than just literary perfection; they breathe love of country, faith in her greatness, and inspiration that kindled and still can kindle the most inert to profound sacrifices for Poland. The successful conclusion of the conflict with the Cossacks

The successful conclusion of

and Tartars, the stemming of the seemingly irresistible Swedish tide, the heroic defence of Czętide, the heroic defence of Czestochowa, the noble deed of Wolodylowski, the defence of Zbaraž, or the epochal victory of Polish arms at Grünwald, all presented by Sienkiewicz with such freshness and vitality, awakened anew the old spirit of knighthood in Poland, filled Polish hearts with courage and hope, and were the spark which grew into a flame of enthusiasm to lead at last through heroic deeds and sacrifices of blood to to lead at last through heroic deeds and sacrifices of blood to a free and independent Poland. Side by side with all these inspiring deeds, he showed no small number of historical characters who set their own welfare and privileges above all other duties, raised themselves above others at the cost of the state, revealed the fatal Polish tendency toward party strife and quarrels which has always been a national vice.

elements, Sienkiewicz distinguish ed himself as the author of a number of psychological novels. But his greatest triumph was the famous Quo Vadis, that masterly picture of the conflict between two worlds, the Christian and the Pagan. This novel won him the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1905, honourary membership in many of the most important many of the most important scientific societies of Europe, the blessing of Pope Leo XIII, and the esteem and admiration of the cultured world.

He invariably used his influence

He invariably used his influence and fame to forward the Polish cause, and in the beginning of our century at the outbreak of the World War, together with Ignacy Paderewski and Autoni Osuchowski, he founded in Swit-zerland the Committee of Relief for Poland which contributed no little to the march of events

He died at Vevey in Switzer-land in November 13,1916 where he remained buried until on October 25,1934 his ashes were transferred to his native land to be interred in the Cathedral of St. John in Warsaw.

Although time may fade the colours of many of his works.

Although time may fade the colours of many of his works, and dim the glory of his name in world literature, still to Poles those flaming historical visions burning with love for Poland will remain in their hearts forever, not only as the prints of literary genius, but as the high-est creative effort of a patriot laid on the altar of his suffering

The Symphony of Love.

As a finale to the present season, which even with the greatest good will and generosity toward the management can hardly be called a successful one for our opera, the Teatr Wielki presented the popular operetta based on Franz Schubert, s music, The House of the Three Maidens (Das Dreimädelhaus) under the The House of the Three Mandens (Das Dreimäleihaus) under the attered title of The Symphony of Lore. Of course this is no masterpiece of operatic composition, but thanks to its number of very beautiful songs, among them the famous Serenade, The House of the Three Maidens is quite acceptable on the stage of an opera, for it popularizes in very charming fashion those exquisite pearls of music that the songs of Franz Schubert always are and will be.

Only at the end of its second season, however, did the management of the Featr Wielki eventually find it possible to choese the kind of operatia that really has a place beside serious

Meanwhile, the Warsaw execu-tion leaves much to be desired on this score. It seems that the change of the title into the change of the title into the bathetic and pompous Symbony of Love weighed heavily on the performance which had nothing in common with lightness, verve or wit, but rather dragged so ponderously ad infinitum that the hearer was wearied to to death especially as the vocal side was insufficiently prepared. Nothing came out well, neither the directing, nor the decoration, nor the cast. nor the cast

Utter Lack Of Invention

Utter Lack Of Invention

Mr. Zizitowiecki, to be sure, has already accustomed us to his utter lack of invention in the performances prepared by him. But this time he exceeded our expectations and gave us such a ghastly stereotype that we were hardly certain we were at a performance in Warsaw and not, in some provincial "opery". Duets and quartets strolling along without any sense or reason in time to the music have long been rejected to the rubbish heap in operetta inscenization, but such are among Zdzitowiecki's brightest ideas. Besidus, the artists did these steps so lightly and gracefully that they resembled so many gamboling elephants at play. As for finesse in dialogue or for bringing out a "point", the players, without capable direction, could do no more than fall into hopeless exaggeration and unanturalness. The group scene likewise resembled family photographs of the gay nineties or tableaux puton in former days at charity balls to resemble living statutes. And the whole performer days at tatical pilon in former cays at charity balls to resemble living statutes. And the whole perfor-mance was made by Mr. Zdzito-wiecki into a sort of slow-motion film lasting some three hours.

the second person who contributed to the general flop was Mrs. Jewniewiczówna. Her decorations were not only destitute of talent or ideas but were even a denial of the most average correctness or artistic culture. A set like that in the first act wherein Mrs. Jewniewiczówa charmingly joined the wieczówa charmingly joined the roofs of the house with a dirty and much rumpled sky excites a terrifyingly sad feeling. She does not seem to be able to handle such a splendid stage; in not one of her sets has she capitalized the spacious depth of the Teatr Wielki stage to give us a decent perspective.

the Teatr Wielki stage to give us a decent perspective.

And finally, a few words about the cast. First of all, none knew their parts well enough, and the voice of the prompter dominated the whole performance dominated the whole performance so as to reach our ears at times more clearly even than the words of the players. The impression made by such a duet between the prompter and the actor, each line reaching our ears in a double version is beyond the power of description. Then again, no one was properly cast.

We appreciate the talent We appreciate the talent of Miss Zofja Fedyczkowska, but the dramatic expression of her voice and her playing makes her a pure sang opera singer, but hardly fits her for the role but hardly fits her for the role of a naive little lyric heroine of of an operetta, Miss Fedyczkowska, being an artist of experience, but the inappropriate role made her seem impossibly articial at times. This takes all the conviction out of her experience as the heroine and defaces the whole charm of the character. Her voice lacks the soft sweet lyricism that is called for and too strongly dramatizes many parts of the role. Of all her songs the Serenade came out best.

The only interesting moment was the ballet in the third act. The dances arranged by Mr. Pia-nowski had charm and lightness in spite of their choreographic triteness. The ballet company performed creditably and the excellent work of the prima balle-specific style — the style of a performance in a country village. It was a model of how to make a pleasant melodious operetta an unbearably dull saw buzzing away continually.

The only joy we felt at this performance was the thought that it was the last achievement of Mrs. Korolewicz-Waydowa on the boards of our opera, and so the end of her sad activity. Our hope and sincerest wish is that under its new management, the ander its new management, the Warsaw Opera will shed its present character together with the shabbleess of its exterior.

Will Manchukuo Clashes Provoke War?

By Frank H. Hedges.

Tokio, April (By mail)

The fear that the Tokio Govern-The fear that the Tokio Govern-ment has entertained for some time that a major incident on the borders of Manchukuo might precipitate a war between Soviet Russia and Japan, is spreading among the general populace of among the general populace of this country. Not a week goes by that does not bring reports of fresh incidents along the boundary between Manchukuo and Siberia, or between Manchukuo and outer Mongolia, in which at least a few lives are lost.

These border clashes are steadily increasing in number, in magnitude and in seriousness. They have ceased to be pinpricks, as a matter of fact, and have reached the status of sword thrusts and bullet wounds. In many of them aeroplanes figure prominently and it must be remembered that Japan is quite as nervous about aeroplanes as the United Kingdom is about submarines.

The Japanese people feel that The Japanese people feel that Russia is growing more ambitions in the Far East. The military alliance with Outer Mongolia, which has been announced by the Moscow Government, is regarded very seriously here. The Foreign Office is quite evidently nervous concerning it and must at least suspect that China is cognisant of its terms and has aquiesced in them.

Secret Alliance

Shanghai dispatches report also the conclusion of a secret alliance between China itself and the Soviet State, an alliance officially denied by Nanking; Japan cannot forget, however, that the Lilobanoff Treaty was in existence all through the Russo-Japanese War and that Japan was competely ignorant thereof. If Tokio had know of the existence of that Treaty, it is existence of that Treaty, it is likely there would be no Manchu-rian questiou to-day, for Japan would probably have taken over that entire country then.

Moreover, there is not the conciliatory attitude on the part of Moscow which existed a year and more ago. The Soviet armea strength in the Far East has been greatly increased; the aeroplanes assembled there have reached a substantial number; there is a fleet of Russian submarines of unknown strength in the harbour unknown strength in the harbour at Vladivostok; border fortifications have been greatly strengthened, and means of communication, particularly by rail, between
have been greatly improved. When Moscow speaks to Tokio now, it speaks with a very considerable army stationed on the borders of Japan and its continential ally, Manchukuo, behind it, and the voice is different from what it was when the road to Lake Baikal in mid-Siberia, lay open to an invading Japanese Army.

Outer Mongolia, now that its military alliance with the Soviet has been proclaimed, speaks and acts with assurance formerly lacking, with an assurance that acking, with an assurance that approaches perilously close to arrogance. Moscow itself well knows the cost of a war with Japan and will not embark upon it unless the end seems to justify such action, but the Mongols of Ulanbator are but children in knowledge of the world and present-day world forces, and might easily and lightly undertake to start such a war.

Knowledge of all this is becoming widespread throughout Japan and among all classes of Japanese, When an incident occurs on the border, the Government is careful to see that only the joint Japanese Manchukuan version thereof nese Manchukuan version thereof is given publicity in Japan. In that version the incident always takes place on Manchukuan soil by invading Mongols or Russians, who are inviaribly the aggressors. Moscow's version (which is not published in Japan but is in China) is just as certainly the exact onnosite.

The February 26 Army rebellion in Tokio, in which a handful of radical junior officers sought to overthrow the existing machinery of Government by assassination overthrow the existing machinery of Government by assassination and force, shook Japan's confidence in itself and in its army. Psychologically, the Japanese people are in a state at present where rumours and reports of impending war are taken much more seriously and are far more disturbing than was the case even a few months ago.

Office clerks and waiters, farmer lands and workers in Japan's Office clerks and waiters, farmer lands and workers in Japan's modern factories and mills anxiously scan the papers for the latest news of Manchurian border developments and for what Moscow and Tokio are saying to each other. They do not want war-far from it. But they do fast that it is wareaching. do fear that it is approaching, and approaching rapidly. There is no sentiment in favour of rushing on to the field of hattle for the glory of the Empire, but for the glory of the Empire, but there is a growing conviction that Japan will be forced to resort to sword and rifle to defend itself and the programme on the Asiatic Continent which it considers vital to its life and rogress. One hears no joking about the possibility of war, and one hears no bragging that one Japanese soldier is worth ten Russians. The talk and the countenances The talk and the countenances of the speakers are serious when of the speakers are serious when they refer to the Russo Mongol versus Japanese - Manchukuan clashes. Many Japanese ask each other when the war will break out, and many predict that it will come within a month. Such predictions are worthless, of course, but they cannot be discounted as impossible. If war should come at this time, it will be precipitated by some incident along Manchukuo's borders of along Manchukuo's borders of such a nature and magnitude that it cannot be averted with honour.

The number of registered unemployed as of May 1 was 414,165 persons. Within the last two weeks, that is from April 15 to May 1, the number of unemployed decreased by 44,899 persons. This figure is less by 49,914 than the corresponding figure one year ago.

According to an official ruling, any amber found cast up on the seashore is the property of the State. It seems that a monopoly has been granted several Gdynia firms, and these firms are permitted to receive the amber found. The personal use of such "rescued" amber or the sale of it is prohibited under penalty of heavy fines.

Two Holidays.

After recent labour disturbances in the south of Poland, the timid feared that the unrest would finally spread to the capital city and that May I would be chosen as the appropriate time by agitators to provoke street disturbances. It was even reported disturbances. It was even reported that the less brave were buying foodstuffs in larger quantities so as to be prepared for every eventuality. Their expectations, however, were happily dissappoint-ed as the police, with their usual ed as the police, with their usual foresight, had locked up the better known communist agitators. the day passed quietly except for an over turned taxicab and minor scuffles before the University where Nationalists tried to provoke where Nationalists tried to provoke the passing socialist parade. More interest than usual, however, was manifest in the demonstrations of the various socialist groups. Contrary to press reports in most Polish papers, over 25,000 persons gathered in Pił udski Place, and their vocal efforts were confined to the Third luternationale exclusively. The Internationale excllusively. The socialists supporting the Government were also numerous. Jewish organizations also held their demonstrations, but they were confined to the Jewish quarter, as usually the trouble is caused by fights between Communists and Socialists rather than by differences between the urban population and the Left represent-

May 3, or Constitution Day, was celebrated, as usual, as a national holiday. The Fifteenth Anniversary of the Silesian Uprising (sgainst the Germans) was also commemorated on this day. In Warsaw, the ceremonies were confined to a military parade on Mokotowska Field in the morning and to numerous gatherings of patriotic organizations in the afternoon. Due to the fact first anniversary the death of Marshal Pilsadski comes on May 12. less emphasis was placed on this holiday than formerly.

The "Graf Hindenburg" will not race the "Queen Mary" across the Atlantic as has been rumoured, both Dr. Eckener and Captain Lehmann assured me.

"The maiden voyage of the "Queen Mary" is what you journalists call front page news' and deservedly so," said Captain Lehmann. "We shall not divert public attention from the "Qeen Mary" on that voyage. It would not be sportsmanlike. It is true that the suggestion was made to us to race the "Queen Mary" to New York. Including insurance, depreciation, crude oil fuel, hydrogen gas for the "lift", wages of the crew and food, the round trip flight from Friedrischshafen to Lakehurst and back, costs approximately 200,000 Marks. With all cabins sold out, and heavy meil, it is expected that the "Graf Hindenburg" will do a little better than break even on the first flight.
